The Pupil will practice this first Book of Studios with the first Class of the Appendix, between which he will divide his attention, and thus combining the Dolce et utile, will perceive, that this first Book of Studios is founded on the precepts already laid down; and that, following the past Exercises, step by step they form practical illustrations of them, and will not only tend to confirm, what he has been learning, but promote his further improvement, and prepare him for the remaining three Books, which will be practiced in company with the two other Classes of the Appendix.

It cannot be too earnestly pressed upon the pupil's attention, that he ought continually to refer to the former instructions, especially as they regard the position of his hands, the keeping up his thumbs, and constantly attending to his left hand, the Exercise of which cannot be too closely observed.

The Studios will in this instance be practiced very slowly, and gradually quickened, till the proper time is attained.
